
SD recognized for disease prevention

The Center for Disease Control has recognized five states, including South Dakota, for their accomplishments on the Project Firstline program.

South Dakota was the only state recognized for marketing an infection-prevention program.

Project Firstline is a national collaborative to educate and train healthcare workers on infectious disease prevention. The South Dakota Foundation for Medical Care leads the program in the state in partnership with the CDC and the state Department of Health.